The ideal regime to be described in Book VII is the regime that we would pray for if the gods would grant us our wishes and we could create a city from scratch, having everything exactly the way we would want it. Human beings alone have the ability to speak, and Aristotle says that we have been given that ability by nature so that we can speak and reason with each other to discover what is right and wrong, what is good and bad, and what is just and unjust. For the polity or any other regime to last, "the part of the city that wants the regime to continue must be superior to the part not wanting this" in quality being extracts from the Ethics and Politics quantity b Butthis,accordingtoAristotle,istoomuchsharing. This means that he emphasizes virtues and moral character and that the best way to resolve moral questions. This may at first seem wise, since the unequal distribution of property in a political community is, Aristotle believes, one of the causes of injustice in the city and ultimately of civil war. One of the most important of these from Aristotle's point of view is in Chapter 4.
