The Second Great Awakening was national in scope, as Baptists and Methodists, especially effective at recruiting plain folk, rose to new prominence. While an evangelical worldview had come to characterize much of the South before the Civil War, the postwar period saw rising membership in evangelical churches and participation in church life. In spite of this, plots and actual rebellions in slave-holding states continued into and through the Civil War.

The following is the opening essay that Garrison used to explain the purpose of the movement. In other instances, it simply was used to justify the ever-increasing demand for more land in the west. Evangelicals insisted that converts take up the cross of Jesus, sometimes alienating not only planters but plain folk men with their radical vision that empowered all who put spiritual equality ahead of earthly values.
