In order that the aircraft could recover in the event of a deep stall it was also fitted with a large tail parachute and the reverse thrust actuators were altered so that they could provide upward thrust in the air and thus provide a nose down pitch. British production continued until Flight International.

Founded as a helicopter charter company in Autair had started fixed wing operations. My father took the plane apart for return trip to Hurn. Douglas had also made a wise decision in offering several versions and sizes of aircraft from the beginning. On completion of that work 'MH' was mainly used to develop or features particular Havilland and Hatfield.
