Where traditions, values, and practices are similar, there usually is a good match and the individual merges his or her identity with that of the body. A deep sense of guilt is awakened—a strange sense, for it seems forever to imply that the individual has committed crimes and deeds that were, after all, not only not committed but would have been biologically quite impossible. It took me until my twenties to realize that the only way to minimize the ill effects of this trait was simply to avoid all.
